After they had escaped the war in Syria, Muzon and her family stayed in a refugee camp in Jordan. The change was difficult. Back home, Muzon had her own room but now the whole family had to share a single tent where they slept, cooked and washed. Fortunately, Muzon could go to school in the camp. She took summer classes to understand the new school system in Jordan and then she had exams. As she continued school, she saw that many of her fellow pupils stopped classes, often girls around her own age. She heard about one girl that had stopped school and was trying to sell her schoolbooks. Muzon found her and made her change her mind. A fighter for girls' education was born. "After that, I began speaking for education to my friends, their parents, neighbours or even just girls I met in the street," she says.
